Unconscious Bias in the Therapy Room

Many counsellors strive to adopt a non-judgmental approach towards their clients and are empathic and congruent with them. However, counsellors often make 'accidental' assumptions and judgements about their clients without being conscious of doing so. When this occurs, counsellors with often the very best of intentions have an unconscious bias towards their clients.

Unconscious bias is a subtle process that can create inequality as it makes assumptions and judgments about clients that may not be accurate and which may disadvantage them and change the therapeutic framework.

These judgements may result in reductions or failures in the counsellor's empathy and congruence. Unless counsellors actively work to explore and uncover their unconscious biases, they may be failing to be acting in the best interests of their clients and so not working ethically.

Clients can also have an unconscious bias towards their counsellors, resulting in the possibility of a 2-way process of unconscious bias in the counselling room.

This years Ethics event will explore:

- the process of unconscious bias in general and how it works in specific groups
- the origins and extent of these unconscious biases
- how unconscious biases can cause counsellors to judge their clients without realising it
- what counsellors can do to start to address unconscious bias - being curious rather than judgmental

In the discussion groups, the event will discuss the above in more detail.
